

By focusing on treatment and successful reintegration of offenders into society, a recent plan seeks to reduce the number of people incarcerated. Repositioning people for productive lives following release, lowering recidivism, and offering second chances are important goals. To address the underlying reasons for criminal behavior, prison reform programs such as this one stress rehabilitation over punishment. According to research, creative approaches to corrections, such as job training, education, and mental health care, can make communities and prisons safer. Reoffending is less likely when people are ready to properly reintegrate into society, which directly improves public safety. Reducing the number of inmates also lessens overcrowding, which is associated with higher rates of violence and bad prison conditions.
